President's Message

Good day ladies! May our loving Lord shower us with blessings, for we fully serve our purpose to be His instruments in helping those who were greatly devastated by Typhoon Yolanda. Let us be their source of hope by offering our prayers and continue giving whatever we can spare. There is no amount too small nor blankets too few that the victims will not appreciate. Anything that comes from the heart will surely be like an embrace that will give warmth to their spirits. Thank you all, for I know that everyone is doing their best.

On our projects, I would like to enjoin all of you to work on our two upcoming projects: The Face of Rotary photo contest and our annual Buntis Wellness. I am asking you for your full support on these projects. We will discuss the details during our next meeting.

Salamat po!

Yours in Rotary service,

First Class President Teodora "Doray" Lucero

A short story by Dir Myrna Valle

AN OLD WOMAN'S BIRTHDAY

Filomena woke with a start. She turned to grab the small alarm clock by her bedside. She gasped at the time, sprung from her bed and rushed to the kitchen.

She walked to and fro, not knowing what to do first. How could she have slept that long? They may be coming any minute now, and she still has to heat all the food, get some fresh flowers for the table, and dust the furniture a bit. She scolded herself endlessly, meanwhile tiny little butterflies flew inside her stomach in anticipation. "Oh well", she said aloud, chuckling to herself. "I'm just an old woman overly excited to see her big babies, and", she checked the calendar again, "it is my birthday".

She shook her head to clear it of thoughts so that she could go full gear ahead to her work. Briskly she divested the refrigerator of all the dishes she had painstakingly prepared the day before --- all her children's favorites, and a lot of sweets for the grandchildren. She can almost hear Juancho, her eldest, deliver his usual line "Mama, this is your best Callos yet". Marita, her spunky unica hija, will of course go for her favorite morcon. And Francisco Jr., her youngest, well, he will anything served on a plate and enjoy himself immensely.

After putting all the dishes to be heated in the oven, she proceeded to spruce up the kitchen. Suddenly everything seemed all-askew. "Oh, Lydia, where are you now when I need you most?", she wailed, referring to her househelp and companion who begged off a couple of months off so as to see to her ailing father in their province. Out went the good tablecloth, the crystal vase and the good chinaware and silver. She washed and wiped each one carefully and laid them out on the table, buffet-style, because she's not sure how many they are now. It's been two years now since she saw them all together. They had missed her birthday last year, but she understood. There was a very violent storm at that time, and they did send telegrams greeting her and apologizing for not being able to make it. Still, she remembered feeling very depressed and alone, missing her husband all the more.

Francisco, bless his soul, who succumbed to a recurring heart ailment almost seven years now. He died the day before her birthday, so her entire family was together on her birthday that year, during the wake. The following year they all came again for their father's one-year death anniversary, and it became a habit of sorts for them to gather in the old house every year, on her birthday.

Filomena caught herself daydreaming again, staring at the crystal vase. "The flowers!", she cried, and rushed to the garden. It was a bright, beautiful morning, and her roses were blooming prettily. She picked a bunch of the best ones and arranged them in the vase. After placing the flowers at the center of table, she stepped back to admire her work. The oven gave a shrill ring, reminding her of the dishes being warmed. She turned it off, debated whether to put them on the table where the dishes can turn cold again, or let them stand in the oven where they could be kept warm. She decided to let the dishes stand in the oven. She could bring them out as soon as they arrive.

She glanced at the clock. Eleven in the morning. "What could be keeping them?", she wondered, then soon dismissed it. "Traffic. Or maybe the kids are taking too long to dress up." She decided to take advantage of the extra time to dust the furnitures. She unveiled the piano and wiped off traces of dust. She would again ask Francisco Jr. to play for her, and Marita to sing, while Juancho harrumphs and scoffs in the background, predicting rain to fall. Soon, their spouses would join in the singing; Juancho's sweet and demure Rowena, Francisco's lively chatterbox Marivic and even Marita's serious lawyer-husband Conrado. And the kids! How big they must be by now! They would run and play around, and Juancho would be their policeman, trying to stop them from knocking off something and breaking it to little pieces.

Her eyes involuntarily wandered to the clock: Eleven-forty-five. "A bath", she thought. "I can still take a bath". She took her time, half-expecting to hear the familiar honking: impatient honks from Francisco Jr., subtle, spaced ones from Juancho, and Marita, well, she alights from the car and knocks. But still no honking.

By now she's really worried. Twelve-thirty. They are really late this time. Usually by that time they are already eating. Filomena sat down, combing her hair and fighting hard not to cry. What if they forgot? What if they will not come at all?

Editorial

"Of course not", she said, "not my children". But then again, she cannot help feeling doubt and anxiety inside her. She was an old woman, the life in her almost gone, with nothing but memories left for her to live by. While her children were at their prime, their lives and that of their families just beginning, each day a promise of better things to come and share with each other. She can still remember herself during her prime, just starting her family with Francisco. The excitement of seeing the children grow and learn, the bittersweet feeling of seeing them slowly break away from her nest to find their own place. And the mixed emotion of happiness and sadness as you see your precious darlings march down the aisle to pledge a new life with their chosen mates. She considered herself extremely lucky, and she endlessly thanked God for it, for having three equally good, disciplined children, none of them ever disappointing not putting her and her husband to shame. But who can blame them, with their hectic lives, if they forgot one birthday of their old Mama?

She had dozed off, and woke up to a clock that read three-thirty. Slowly she picked herself up and went out to her garden. The day is still bright and shiny, but somehow looked and felt bleak for Filomena. She checked her mailbox and found it empty. She put her hand inside just the same, to feel its emptiness.

She went inside, the clock reading four-fifteen. "They're not coming", she told herself firmly, "and that's that". With all her might she tried to stop herself, but like a swollen river emptying itself to the sea, she finally let go, sobbing at first, then giving up, crying all the more. Her tears poured out generously, releasing all her nervousness, her anxiety, her excitement, her frustration. How an old woman could feel all these on her birthday was beyond her, and she chuckled a little bit, despite herself, as she wiped off her tears.

She checked her face in the mirror and decided to prim herself up a bit. Her face was small and pleasant, with more laugh lines than frown lines, not bad-looking at all. Marita often teased her about finding another husband, and she had teased right back, but deep inside she knew she couldn't find it in her to replace her Francisco. He was kind, very romantic. If only they were together now, she thought, she would have been happy even if her children forgot her birthday.

Feeling tears threatening to fall again, she stood and went to the kitchen. She feasted on her delicious dishes and complimented herself for her own cooking. She left her used dishes unwashed at the sink and said, "No, not today. It's my birthday".

Editorial

She turned on the radio to listen to some music. Humming, she went to her closet and looked at her clothes. "Tsk! Old clothes!", Filomena clucked. "I should shop. Yes, I should. Tomorrow."

Feeling a lot better, she picked out a pink dress and wore it, still humming. Again she checked the time. Eight-thirty in the evening. She held her head up high, but inside she felt something go down, down, down. All hope was lost. Feeling miserable again, she slumped at the sofa and stared into space until she fell into a deep, dreamless sleep.

"Marita, will you pry your kid off the ceramic elephant please? And will somebody close the gate, who left it open anyway?", it sounded like Juancho.

"I'm hungry. Why is Mama still asleep? And on the couch, too!" That one is certainly Francisco Jr., talking with his mouth full.

Filomena opened her eyes, believing herself to be dreaming. She must be dreaming. They can't be here.

"Look, look, Lola's awake!", cried Biboy, actually Francisco III. No, she's not dreaming.

She sat up and looked at them, amazed, surprised, and confused. "How did you all get in?"

Marita laughed. "Francisco Jr. climbed your fence. And fell off, too!", she managed, then was reduced to a laughing lump on their father's easy chair.

"Oh", she said, laughing with her, then remembered something. "But why did you come today?"

Juancho sat down beside her and gave her a kiss. "What do you mean by that, Mama? It's your birthday, or did you forget? Come on, you're not that old", he teased.

"That's right", Francisco Jr. piped in, still chewing. "And you cooked a lot of food, too!"

Filomena looked at them. "But, but..., my birthday was yesterday. Look, I marked it at the calendar – August 2. Today is August 3 already, isn't it?", she said, beginning to doubt herself.

Her children looked at each other, puzzled. "No, Mama", Marita said finally. "Today is August 2, your birthday".

They all looked at each other, thinking, then Francisco Jr. laughed aloud.

They all looked at each other, thinking, then Francisco Jr. laughed aloud.

"I get it, I get it. Look – Mama the super stingy re-used her 1987 calendar. Look!"

"What's wrong with that?", Filomena asked her youngest son, still puzzled but amused. "I just forward the days by one day, so what?"

Juancho, ever prim and proper, spoke. "Nothing wrong, Mama, only you forgot that this year is a leap year. So you're supposed to advance the days by two days from March 1 thereon", he finished, sounding more like a college professor than her son.

Filomena was already laughing and crying at the same time. She jumped up and hugged her children, Francisco Jr., still munching; Juancho, who fondly patted her at the back; and Marita who hugged her right back. "Oh dear", she said, "I thought you all forgot. I thought you got so busy and forgot all about me. Oh, I'm such a silly, silly old woman".

"Nonsense, Mama", Juancho reproached, and turned to the entire brood. "Now, everybody, gather up and let's sing for Mama".

They sang, with Juancho flinching at every off-key note, Marita taking up center stage acting as conductress, Francisco Jr. going from kid to kid trying to make them sing louder, and Filomena, still mumbling that she's a silly old woman, but feeling like the richest and luckiest silly old woman in the world.

President's Message for December

One winter day, Rotary founder Paul Harris took a walk down a well-kept street just outside Chicago. Watching children sledding down a hillside, he recalled his own boyhood in New England. At that moment, he decided that if he ever were to own a home, it would be on top of that hill on Longwood Drive.

In 1912, Harris and his wife, Jean, made that dream a reality. They named their new home Comely Bank, after the street where Jean grew up in Scotland.

Over the years, the Harrises hosted Rotary meetings and entertained visiting dignitaries, surrounded by objects they had collected on their travels throughout the world. The trees they planted in their friendship garden still grace the yard. In 1947, Harris died there; Jean sold the home not long afterward and returned to Scotland.

The property changed hands twice more before the Paul and Jean Harris Home Foundation purchased it in 2005. Through the efforts of that group, and with the help of the Rotary clubs of Chicago and Naperville, the Harris home has been saved from demolition. Now, it is up to us to protect the home for posterity, as a place for Rotarians to gather in the spirit of friendship and service.

The RI Board has agreed to loan $500,000 to the Paul and Jean Harris Home Foundation to assist with the restoration of this irreplaceable piece of Rotary history. A goal of $5 million has been set for the project, to complete the necessary renovations and to provide an endowment fund to allow the property to operate as a museum and historic site.

I am committed to the restoration of the Paul and Jean Harris Home and hope you agree that this project is worthy of your support. My wife, Jetta, and I have made a contribution to our Rotary Foundation to establish a donor advised fund to accept contributions from anyone who shares our love of Rotary history, and our desire to preserve Rotary's past.

If you would like to join us, please go to www.rotary.org/daf and click on "How to Contribute." Include the account name, "Paul Harris Home Preservation," and number, 474. A gift of any size is welcome, and naming opportunities are available in the home and garden for those who are considering a larger gift.

We are excited to have the opportunity to celebrate the spirit of Paul Harris in this special way. Together, we can save his home for generations of Rotarians to come.

Reflections

"Love is mightier than hate. Give it one half the advertising that hate has had and there will be no more war".

Paul P. Harris
